Task: Write a short explanation (2-3 paragraphs) of your process and reasoning for breaking down the layout.

My thought process when breaking down the layout involves looking for the large blocks or the most common tags in HTML. I begin by identifying the header, main, and footer sections. After that, I try to determine which elements should belong together in one section or container and whether they form a list.

For the header, I check if the website has links, forms, or an image link, and whether a heading title is included. For the <main> tag, I look for the central content of the website, then break it down into sections. From there, I identify which elements are included in each section.

For the footer, I typically look for a group of links that I can combine into a list.
